Peggy Guggenheim And London

Art was integral to the life of Peggy Guggenheim. In fact, she once said that her gallery "makes a real basis for my life and gives me a purpose". For fans of the collector, it's likely that her museum on Venice's Grand Canal springs to mind. But did you know that her first gallery was actually in London? If that's news to you, Savile Row's Ordovas gallery is hosting the perfect lesson to educate. It's all about Peggy's first ever collection spot, Guggenheim Jeune, her relationship to London and how her time here between 1938 and 1939 planted a vital seed for success throughout the rest of her life. Showcasing some of her finest collected works by the likes of Jean (Hans) Arp and Yves Tanguy, as well as a catalogue of documents which delve into the details of her first space, here lies some real hidden stories to discover more about one of the greatest contributors to 20th-century art. Sign us up. Until 14 December at Ordovas, 25 Savile Row, London W1S. ordovasart.com
